WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

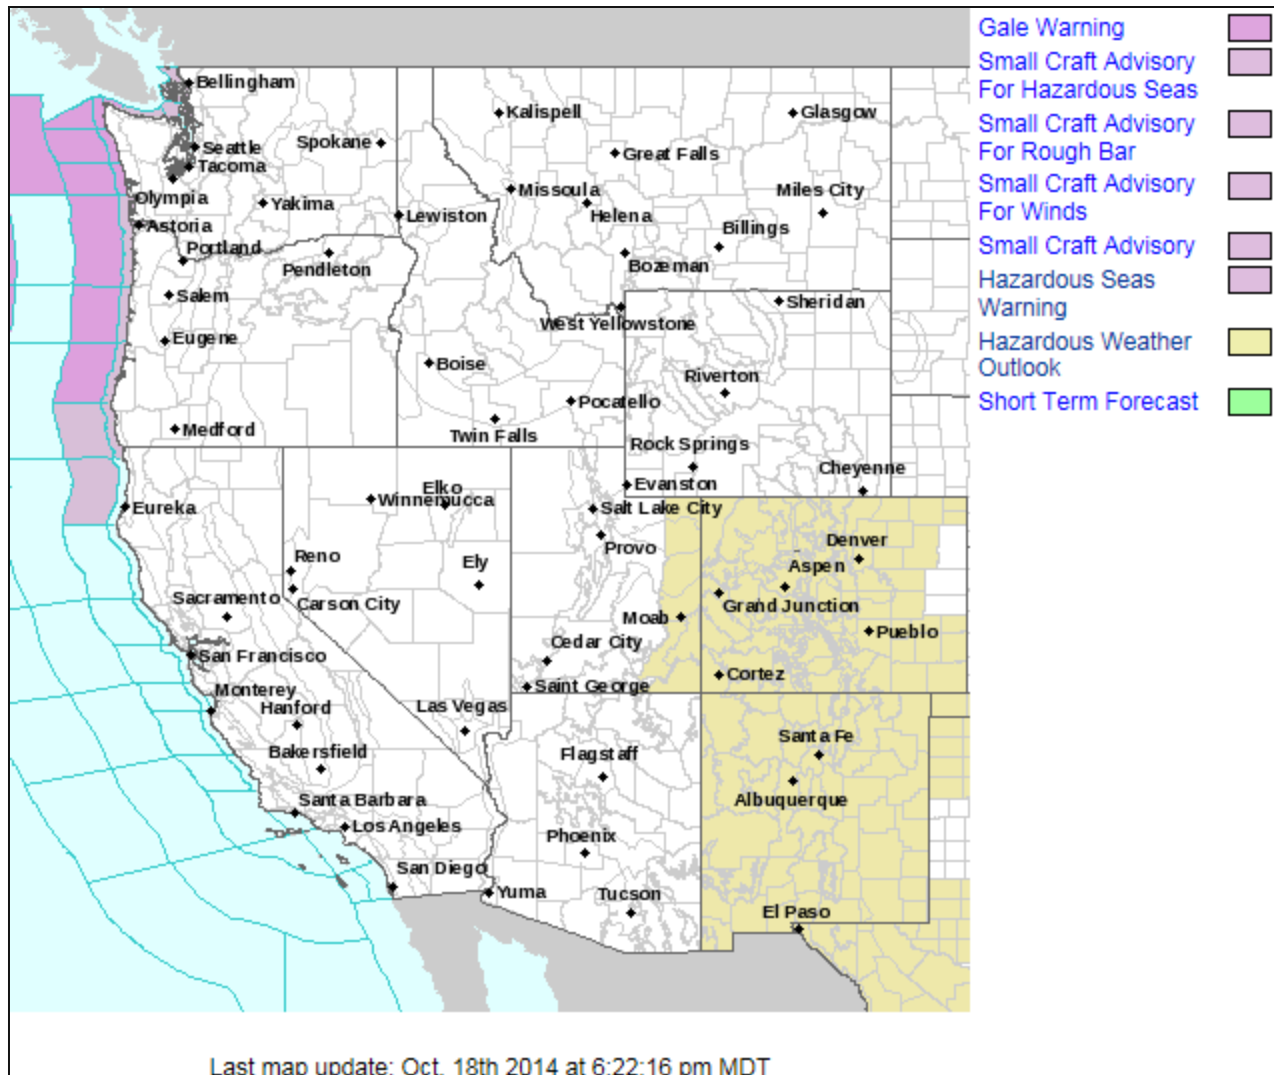

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA:

Northern California will be in a cool, moist pattern for most of the 7-Day period. A weak low pressure trough and cold front broke up over the North Operations area Friday night after dropping wetting rain with up to an inch of rain in far northwest California, a trace to 0.25 inches elsewhere in the northern and western mountains and little to no rain elsewhere. Weak high pressure will briefly pass over the area today and early Sunday and produce mostly clear skies with near normal temperatures. Southwest winds will increase throughout the day Sunday as the next low pressure system approaches the coast. Clouds will increase late Sunday, and rain will move onshore around sunrise Monday. The system will spread across the North Operations area Monday and dissipated by early Tuesday. Rainfall totals for this system will range from 1.00-1.50 inches in far northwest California to a trace to 0.10 inches in far eastern and southern areas. Snow levels will drop to 5500-6000 feet. By late Tuesday a drying and warming trend will be underway as another weak high pressure area moves overhead. Another low pressure system will bring rain to the far northwest corner on Thursday, but it may not move inland until next weekend. Inland areas will be warmer with gusty southwest winds late in the week while the system sits over the North Coast and offshore.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA:

There will be little change in the weather through Tuesday as a couple of weak Pacific troughs move inland over the West Coast. Maximum temperatures will remain near normal, with upper 50s and 60s in the mountains and 70s to low 80s in the valleys. Minimum humidity will remain mainly between 20% and 40%. A big warming trend along with a drop in humidity into the teens will occur Wednesday through the end of next week as a strong ridge of high pressure builds northward from Mexico. Temperatures will be 10 to 15 degrees above normal next Thursday and Friday. Winds will continue to be light onshore through Tuesday and then become light offshore Wednesday through the end of next week. No rainfall or strong offshore winds are expected across the region for the next week.
